Welcome

The World Bank estimates that only 10 % of rural land in sub-Saharan Africa is registered, which leaves 90 % unregistered and subsequently vulnerable to land grabbing, expropriation without fair compensation and corruption. Furthermore, in many countries it is practically impossible for women to formally hold legal property rights i.e. to own land.

In areas where the community administers the land, women have difficulty accessing land as many local communities have strong traditional and patriarchal structures. Securing access to land for the rural poor (men and women) has long been a key component in poverty reduction measures as well as for economic development. It is well known that land conflicts escalate and become violent when the land governance systems in place are ineffective, corrupt and/or dysfunctional. This causes weak, unsecured and non-negotiable land tenure and resource rights. Efforts to protect land records, to mediate land disputes and to rebuild capacity in land governance can help reduce tension, stabilize regions, set the stage for productive investments and increase trust for public services, all contributing to welfare and economic growth.

This advanced international training programme (ITP) focuses on land related issues and should be viewed in light of the ability to develop trusted public administration with a clear mandate to enhance impartial, transparent and reliable services to society – a practical implementation of “good land governance” into Applied Land Governance.

The central point of this programme is cooperation and trust to stimulate basic democratic principles for equality and transparency in public administration. The programme will integrate human rights in accordance with the UN declaration and especially strengthen women’s land rights in the context of customary land tenure.

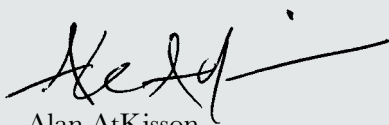

This ITP is designed for professionals within public organisations, members of CSO’s, NGO’s and representatives from the local community, to initiate, implement and manage processes of change.

The programme participants will also be exposed to the latest developments in land management. Moreover, they will create regional networks to share, exchange and acquire knowledge on how to effectively deliver services enhancing people’s, and in particular women’s, land rights in a participatory and transparent manner. The methodology used assumes that your organisation wishes to carry out change regarding these aspects and is willing to invest its own resources to make change happen.

Lantmäteriet (the Swedish mapping, cadastral and land registration authority) has long experience of international cooperation in these fields.

In this brochure you will find information on the specific objectives for this particular programme, its content and structure, and how and when to apply. The scheduled programmes will include work in each country and training in Sweden and a selected African country.

Sida and Lantmäteriet hereby invite you to nominate candidates.

This in order to make a difference on the ground to enhance the living conditions for poor and vulnerable people living mainly in peri-urban and urban areas. This programme aims to give participants new tools and knowledge on how to approach and elevate a settlement towards formal status with increased security of ownership and access to land as a result.

- › Impact: To contribute to sustainable and secure living conditions in peri-urban/urban settings by increasing cooperation and building trust in land governance authorities by applying a holistic approach to land interventions.
- › Outcome A: Land administration authorities have taken initiatives to strengthen the lands rights for inhabitants in vulnerable areas.
- › Outcome B: Land administration authorities have taken initiatives to improve the cooperation with other authorities, civil society and local stakeholders.
- › Outcome C: Women's participation in land administration and land related services has increased.

Contents

Secured land ownership rights are key elements for sustainable development. The control of land and its use is a major task for governments and legal systems. An impartial public sector is a prerequisite for effective land governance and sustainable land use.

The programme will have a holistic approach to the change intervention which will include bringing in participants from a wide net in the society, from central and local government institutions via NGO's to key opinion makers/influencers from the local community.

Each participant of the ITP will contribute to a particular change project derived from the local context. Before implementing the change project, it is necessary to establish its intention and scope within each participant's organisation to ensure full support and commitment during the whole programme period.

The central point of this programme is cooperation and trust with the intention to facilitate sustainable results after the completion of the change projects.

The programme is hence about organisational integrity, improved cooperation and trust between central and local government, NGO's, CSO's and the local community with regards to land management.

Essential aspects of land matters that will permeate the entire programme are:

- Sustainability
- Environmental aspects
- Gender equality and Human rights
- Conflict sensitivity

The programme strives for effective results through change projects towards attaining organisational and institutional change as well as enhanced knowledge and skills.

Change project

The change project approach should strengthen knowledge, capacity and awareness among the participants to influence and inspire their home organisations, initiating improvements in line with adopted national plans and policies for the Land Sector. This covers aspects of accountability, transparency, effectiveness and quality of service delivery for women and men with different ethnic and social backgrounds. It is essential that selected change projects derive from the local context and are implemented by participants' organisations.

The programme is divided into 3 courses with different participants, each to last one year. Each programme will continue its own change project with strong local ownership. The experiences and results achieved will be handed over to the next course.

The change projects are already on-going. In Liberia, the change project is "Deeding of Government land" in Bentol. In Zimbabwe, the change project is "Planning and constructing a market site" in Epworth.

Possible areas of interest for the change projects:

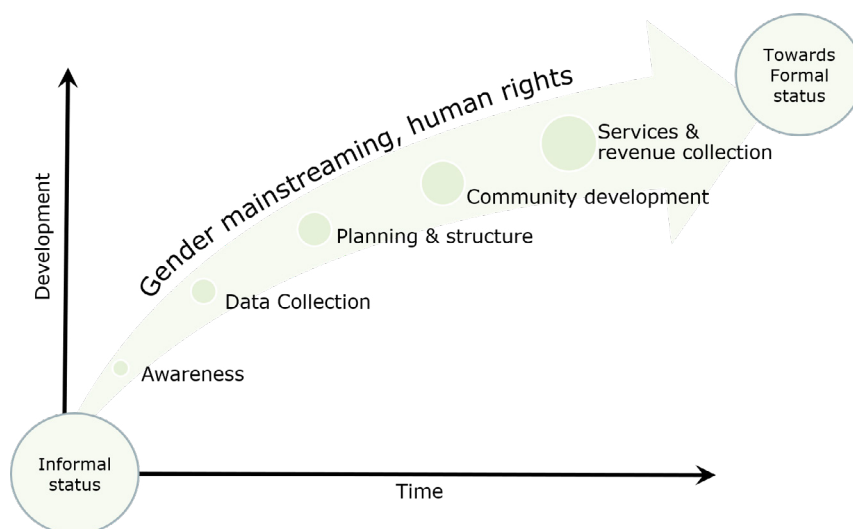

- Waste management
- Drone Mapping & Data Collection
- Street addressing
- Issue land occupation permits
- Awareness to communities and other stakeholders
- Women's market
- Cooperatives

Programme structure

The driving force behind programme participation is the ambition and willingness among participants and their organisations to carry out change projects identified and agreed upon in the local context contributing to the overall programme objectives.

Mentors from Lantmäteriet will support the participants to carry out their change projects.

The change projects and work approach will be elaborated among the participants and their organisations. During the entire programme period the achieved results will be measured and compared with expectations to indicate the status of the change projects.

The duration of each course within this programme is approximately one year containing work in each country and training in Sweden as well as training in a third African country (to be selected).
